Historical Note

Like the rest of the eastern seaboard, gold fever hit the Vineyard in the late fall of 1848. Suddenly gold, not whales, lured Vineyard men away. A clipping from the Vineyard Gazette explains, "it is a well-known fact that the digging of gold in California stirred Martha's Vineyard from center to circumference. During the year 1849 two ships, three schooners, one bark and one brig, carrying in all nearly three hundred men, sailed from her ports to San Francisco." The vessels were the ships Splendid and Walter Scott, the schooners Rialto, Two Brothers, and L.M. Yale, the bark Sarah, and the brig Vesta. The bark Oscar left from Mattapoisett with many Vineyard men on board. Certainly other Vineyard men shipped out on other vessels or went by an overland route.

Mining companies were formed with members purchasing shares to buy or charter a ship to take them around Cape Horn and up the Pacific coast to San Francisco. Some returning whale ships were refitted for California as ship owners turned to the more reliable passenger and freight business. One of the first associations, the Rialto Mining Company, set sail in the schooner Rialto from Holmes Hole in February of 1849. Others soon followed. At least one Vineyard captain, Henry Cleveland, on-board the whaleship Niantic, switched from whaling in the Pacific to providing transportation to men who were waiting in Panama for passage north to California. However, as personal letters reveal, California often proved to be a disappointing and difficult place to make a living. In 1851 Henry Marchant writes that he would "rather be with my family and dig clams for a living than to live such a life as a man lives in this cuntrey." In the same year Edward Pease observed that "it is no uncommon thing to hear men say that when they left New England they left their principles behind." Many men, disillusioned with the gold fields turned to driving freight wagons, opening shops, or simply returned to whaling, as the bark Sarah did in 1850.

Scope and Content Note

This .25 cubic foot collection contains documents arranged chronologically within their series. These documents consist of personal letters written from California, business papers relating to the mining companies formed on the Vineyard for the purpose of gold exploration, and a number of reference materials on the gold rush in general and the Vineyard's participation in it.

The personal letters (1849-1856) reveal the often less than ideal conditions that existed in California for the Vineyard men. Henry Marchant writes longingly to his wife of missing his family, of hardships endured, and the rough nature of the gold country. Both Marchant and Edward Pease write about freighting as a work alternative to gold mining. Pease also tells of a harrowing trip on a hard road, wallowing in the mud, leaving several oxen for dead. The business papers of the mining companies formed for the purpose of mining in California consists of constitutions, meeting minutes, and lists of members. The Vineyard Mining Company papers also consist of a number of original documents related to outfitting the Bark Sarah for the trip West.

The MVM also has in their collection the log book from the ships Oscar and Sarah (Box 65B). This log, kept by an unnamed writer tells of the voyage of the ship Oscar from Mattapoisett on October 6, 1849 through April 18, 1850 when he left the ship in California. The writer then kept a journal of his mining adventures in the log book. On November 8, 1850 the writer boards the Bark Sarah, of the Vineyard Mining Company. At this time the ship returns to whaling and our writer keeps a log of this voyage through February 24, 1851. This is a fascinating account of how Vineyard men combined whaling with their desire to participate in the gold rush. Clippings include a piece about Captain Henry Cleveland's ship Niantic which transported men from Panama to San Francisco and eventually became a beached storehouse and hotel.

Reference materials, copies of publications and clippings, relate to the gold rush in general and the Vineyard's participation in the gold rush. This series also contains reference materials listing crew names and background information on the ships which sailed.
